

Toolkit fidelity scale items (California 02/27/2006)

Background: The Toolkit and the actual Grant approved by SAMHSA specify factors that are believed to be important in successful implementation of evidence-based practices in general and IDDT in specific. Most of these elements are identified in the General Organizational Index and the IDDT Fidelity Scale. But some have not been a focus of formal tracking. The following four items comprise a separate scale that was used in the California implementation study to determine whether any or all of these elements are important for successful implementation of IDDT.

- A. High level and consistent administrative support as shown by activities such as integration of IDDT into multiple county-wide committees and programs such as the Training Bureau, sending staff to high performing IDDT programs for training, providing technical assistance to other IDDT programs, designing, printing and disseminating materials describing IDDT programs, explicit inclusion of IDDT in MHSA and other planning processes.

Site is basically isolated; no support from higher administrative levels; no inclusion in committees and planning; no resources available specifically for IDDT.	Minimal support for IDDT. There are some resources available for the IDDT site but no resources, planning, or integration in the rest of the county or administrative structure.	Moderate support for IDDT. At least one of the activities listed above is pursued consistently with resources. [No credit given for weak, inconsistent, sporadic attempts.]	Two of the activities listed above are pursued consistently with resources. [No credit given for weak, inconsistent, sporadic attempts.]	Three of the activities listed above are pursued consistently with resources. [No credit given for weak, inconsistent, sporadic attempts.]

B. County implementation committee.
